10. Document Management Adobe provides several ways to create and access documents, including Sharepoint, Adobe LiveCycle, and Adobe Connect Online. These programs provide benefits as well as drawbacks. Adobe LiveCycle was originally designed to provide document sharing between several people working on a project, and in order to accommodate this need, it enables very extensive sharing, similar to the way LinkedIn enables you to share updates about your profile. The new version of LiveCycle enables companies to host their Sharepoint documents within the file, rather than simply linking to a Sharepoint site. Adobe Connect Online provides a way to create Adobe Connect Live meetings where people can collaborate on projects and share documents and audio, video, and other content. Adobe Connect Live meetings is an online version of Adobe Connect, which enables video conferencing in real time. This enables you to collaborate with up to 100 people on a project, from all over the world, in real time.

Q: How to safely cast as IEnumerable or IList There is a class which implements both IEnumerable and IList interfaces. Recently we've started using reflection to get the actual type of the object. I guess the problem occurs when there is no type information explicitly defined by an interface. What is the best way to safely cast the object to the concrete type? We need to check either IEnumerable or IList. What we've done so far: We defined a partial method to return the correct collection type (IEnumerable or IList) based on the actual type of the object. Is there any method to safely cast the object to the correct collection type? Solution: In this case I've decided to go with partial: protected partial class MyObject { //... public IEnumerable AsIEnumerable() { if (Type.IsGenericType(GetType()) && Type.GetTypeInfo(GetType()).IsGenericType) { return Enumerable.Cast<T>(type.GetMethod(nameof(Enumerable.Cast)).Invoke(null, BindingFlags.Public | BindingFlags.Static,
