Note To find out more about how to open a new file in Photoshop, read the box on Opening a New File, a Step You'll Happily Remember, on Opening a New File. Your Photoshop icon also sports the little padlock icon. This means that your image is in a locked mode, and you won't be able to make further changes to the original file (more on locking images in the next chapter). It's up to you how to lock (or not) a file—and whether you want to protect it from subsequent editing. Most people leave it locked, as long as they aren't making changes at the same time. To select an item, press the Shift key while clicking.

Q: For different block of documents, is it ok if there are some "similar" informations are stored in the same column or row in same data structure? For instance, when viewing the ten most recent changes, I'm thinking that some information about what content was changed on each document might be useful, even though for these ten documents, the information might be identical. Would it be appropriate to store the information (like document names, date, and change content) in a column or row in the same data structure in Redis? A: You ask if it's appropriate to store the information (like document names, date, and change content) in a column or row in the same data structure in Redis? Well, technically speaking, no. Let's talk semantics here. In this particular case, you could technically store the data in a row if you just want to have something that looks like a row, and a column if you want to have something that looks like a column. But the fact of the matter is that it's not strictly true that you shouldn't store the same piece of data in multiple tables in the same database. Why? Because you may have other dimensions that give you a useful sense of what those pieces of data have in common, and therefore what they represent. For example, in your case, I'm thinking the dimensions of "document names", "date", and "change content" each have a "similarity" of exactly 0 to the next one, so the "document name", "date", and "change content" (or rather, "ten most recent changes") fields could all be stored in a single record. In other words, you should judge the "appropriateness" of storing the same data in multiple tables on the application of "the right query language". In this particular case, if you have a relatively simple query to perform (such as 10 most recent documents) you might choose to just store the data in a single table. But if you're doing something more complex (such as being able to pull "all of the transactions in the last week, at or under a certain cost") then it might be best to break it up into multiple tables. So that's the answer to your question. You shouldn't store the same data in multiple tables in the same database. It depends on the kind of data you're storing, the kind of queries you need to perform

1. Field of the Invention The invention relates to a method of and an apparatus for making wet wipes from recycled flexible thermoplastic sheet materials. More particularly, this invention relates to a method and apparatus for making wet wipes for personal hygiene and other uses, for example, cleaning underarms or other parts of the body with soap or lotion. 2. Description of the Related Art Wet wipes are marketed today for a number of applications. Wet wipes provide consumers with an easy, convenient and pleasant way to cleanse or treat a surface area of the body such as the skin, lips, eyes or other mucous membranes. Wet wipes also provide a means of cleaning the skin in situations where a person is not able to reach or use soap. Soap is used in personal care products, such as the bath and shower, because it removes oil and grime from the skin without stripping moisture from the skin's surface. However, soap is not very effective for certain cleaning or skin treatments such as the treatment of skin irritations and rashes. Lotion is more effective than soap for the treatment of rashes or other skin irritations. The use of lotion or other cleansing products is normally limited because of the thin, dry material that is typically applied to the skin with a cloth or cotton ball. The thin, dry material requires that the user keep trying to make contact with the skin to keep the lotion or other cleansing product from running down the skin. This is both inconvenient and not very effective. The user's lack of success with keeping the lotion or other cleansing product on the skin often results in the lotion or other cleansing product running down the surface to be cleaned or treated. In response to this problem, wet wipes were developed for use with lotion and other cleansing products. The wet wipes were provided in a bundle with an attached wet wipe applicator. The wet wipe applicator would have a round, cylindrical shape. The applicator would include a plurality of holes. The bundle and applicator could then be used in conjunction with the lotion or other cleansing product. The consumer would dip the wet wipe applicator into a container holding the lotion or other cleansing product. The consumer would then retrieve the wet wipe applicator and wipe the lotion or other cleansing product onto a desired surface such as the skin. Because the wet wipe was soaked in the lotion or other cleansing product, the lotion or other cleansing product would not run down the user's skin. However, the consumer had
