Field of the Invention This invention relates to an electrical connector assembly, and particularly to an electrical connector assembly having improved contacts that are designed to avoid contact and damage to the contacts during connecting and disconnecting of the connector. 2. Description of Related Art A typical conventional electrical connector assembly includes an insulative body having a plurality of passageways extending therethrough. A plurality of contacts are received in the passageways and fixed in position therein by a retaining member mounted on the insulative body. Each contact has a contacting portion extending through a rear end of the passageway of the insulative body and a fixed portion extending from the opposite end of the passageway of the insulative body and projecting into the passageway of the insulative body. The contacts are usually exposed to outside for easy connection with mating contacts, but the exposed parts of the contacts can be easily damaged during connecting or disconnecting of the contacts. U.S. Pat. No. 6,176,939 discloses an electrical connector assembly including an insulative body with a passageway, a plurality of contacts received in the passageway. The contacts include a retaining portion fixedly positioned in the passageway and a fixed portion. The contacts are coupled to a retaining member which is mounted on the insulative body to retain the contacts in the passageway. The retaining portion is locked in a groove of the insulative body and the fixed portion extends into a slit of the insulative body and is resiliently received in an insertion slot defined between sidewalls of the insulative body to avoid contact and damage to the contacts. The contacts are thus retained in the insulative body by the retaining member, but the contact and retaining member design is complicated. Furthermore, the fixed portion is resiliently received in the insertion slot and the fixed portion tends to deform outwardly during connecting or disconnecting of the contact, thus being unable to completely retain the contact in the insulative body. U.S. Patent Application Publication No. 2007/0275898 discloses an electrical connector assembly including an insulative body with a passageway, a plurality of contacts received in the passageway. Each contact has a contacting portion extending through a rear end of the passageway and a fixed portion extending from
